COMMENTARY

The point of departure here is taken from Saint Paul's epistle to the Philippians in which he discusses joy while in prison. His joy is based on anticipation and confidence. How does one musically portray such optimism? If joy is a state, then music is the perfect vehicle to express the state of joy through consistency (repetition) and adaptability (variation).

In this interpretation of joy, the music uses two themes which undergo different transformations. Anticipation is created with a permutation of the Iambic meter (short-short-long accents) whereas confidence is represented by rhythmic syncopation which necessitates eventual resolution. With syncopation we know it will resolve. It is this continual playful use of these two rhythmic and melodic motives that creates a state of joy.

And what better way to begin a sense of joy than with the harp, the symbol for joy and people coming together?
